GPC Board and Staff at Spring Retreat.

Moving in New Directions

In late March, Great Peninsula Conservancy's board and staff met for a full day to strategize about GPC's future. In 2008, we strengthened our foundation by adding staff, engaging members, and reconnecting with partners. We also unveiled a Streams and Estuaries Initiative with several key projects already underway. Our charge for the March retreat was to evaluate priorities for our conservation program, and we enthusiastically decided to move in some exciting new directions.

We agreed that collaboration with partners is a key quality of successful land trusts. Great Peninsula Conservancy will continue to be a leader in local conservation, while working diligently to build and strengthen partnerships with tribes, counties, community groups, large landowners, and others across our region. GPC brings many strengths to these ventures including our expertise in private land conservation, relationships with landowners and community groups, network of volunteer land stewards, and our reputation as an independent non-profit organization.

We reaffirmed our commitment to the Streams and Estuaries Initiative, adding a shoreline component to the program. Where feasible, our goal will be to provide public access to shorelines while retaining natural shorelines devoid of bulkheads and docks, which reduce the ecological value of shorelines to marine life.

Despite 150 years of logging and European settlement, the Great Peninsula contains some of the largest intact lowland forest remaining in Puget Sound. While a significant portion of this acreage is protected as state forest land, much is still privately-owned by families and corporations. These forestry operations have supported a local forest economy and kept the land out of development. However, times are changing and the economic pressure to convert these forest lands to rural housing is intense.

It is against this background that Great Peninsula Conservancy launches a new Forests Initiative to address this threat to our forested landscape. Our central challenge is to conserve our native forests to safeguard open space and biological diversity. We strongly believe that actively-managed forests have important environmental and social benefits, as well economic importance to our way of life. We will seek opportunities to collaborate with owners of working-forest lands to keep them out of development and to encourage long-term forest stewardship. We will also pursue opportunities to conserve large, intact forest lands that hold rich plant and wildlife communities.

One important offshoot of our new focus on forest conservation is our decision to advocate for forest conservation through selective participation in county, agency, and regional planning forums. We would like to ensure the actions we take today to protect our forest landscape truly benefit future generations.

Partnerships, shoreline conservation, a new forests initiative, and participation in regional planning for conservation of rural landscapes: GPC is definitely moving in new directions.

GPC Conservation Initiatives

Streams and Estuaries

Hundreds of lowland streams and tidal estuaries dot the uplands and shorelines of the Great Peninsula of Kitsap, Mason, and western Pierce counties. While often individually small in size, collectively, these creeks and coves have a big impact on the health of Puget Sound. Many fish, birds, and marine life depend upon them for survival. Natural beauty, abundant wildlife, and water access draw people to these special places too.

Curley Creek Estuary

In 2008, Great Peninsula Conservancy launched a Streams and Estuaries Initiative to expand our efforts to conserve these critical habitats. Wherever possible, our focus is on full protection of healthy streams from headwaters to estuary. Conservation projects already underway include an important acquisition on Big Beef Creek, which is one of the best remaining Hood Canal salmon spawning streams. Other projects involve conservation of Martha John Creek on Port Gamble Bay and restoration of Gilberton Creek on Port Orchard Bay.

Forests

Native forests once dominated the landscape of the Great Peninsula. Though we have significantly altered or lost 98 percent of the original forest, we are still a region rich in forests. These forests of cedar, spruce, and fir support an intricate, self-sustaining environment. They also support timber jobs, clean our air and water, cool our cities in the summer, and provide recreation for our families. Now more than ever, conversion to residential and urban uses threatens forests across our region. Time is short and in early 2009, Great Peninsula Conservancy launched a Forests Initiative.

GPC conserves native forests for their biological diversity. We also protect working forests, which support our local forest economy and retain green spaces. GPC is pursuing a dual path of on-the-ground conservation and participation in public forums as an advocate for forest conservation. Our strategy will preserve forest ecosystems while also protecting rural livelihoods and heritage.

Community Green Spaces

Green spaces are a community necessity, which have value beyond preservation of wildlife habitat and neighborhood aesthetics. Small forest enclaves, native wetlands, stream corridors, and farm fields help to define our communities. They provide many children with their first opportunity to explore the great outdoors. Farms feed our community's growing interest in buying locally-grown products. Trails and greenways attract neighbors and visitors alike and sustain our quality of life. Conservation of community green spaces like these can help revitalize a neighborhood and provide a boost to the local economy.

Great Peninsula Conservancy has a long history of conserving the special green spaces in our communities from the Indianola Greenway and Silverdale's Clear Creek Trail to the many family-owned natural lands we protect through conservation easements. Many of these successes happen through community partnerships and the initiative of neighbors who act as long-term stewards for the land.

Ownership Key

GPC conserves lands using a variety of conservation tools including:

Assist (A): GPC assists other agencies and organizations with land protection. They retain ownership and GPC doesn't monitor. Total Acres: 647.72

Conservation Easement (C): Permanent restrictions placed on the land to protect conservation values. GPC monitors these lands but does not have ownership. Total Acres: 1042.74

Fee Ownership (F): These lands are owned and monitored by GPC. Total Acres: 325.20

Trail License (L): Allows GPC to install and maintain a public trail across private or public lands. Total Acres: 22.82

Transfer (T): Lands protected by GPC and passed to another organization or government agency for conservation use. Total Acres: 31.98

Total All Acres: 2,070.46

Conservation Value Key

GPC protects lands that possess conservation values including:

Forest: Helps maintain water quality, limits erosion, processes carbon dioxide, and protects animal habitats.

Historic: Protects the character of our communities and helps people maintain connections with the past.

Open Space: Helps prevent soil erosion and filters rainwater, also provides wildlife habitat and undeveloped vistas.

Recreation: Provides opportunity for relaxation and enjoyment of natural environments.

Shoreline: Serves as natural buffer, safeguards water quality, and provides wildlife habitat.

Stream: Provides habitat for fish and other wildlife, and safeguards water quality.

Wetland: Protects and improves water quality, helps control flooding and erosion, and provides habitat for terrestrial and aquatic wildlife.

Working Land: Working land (e.g. farmland, shellfish bed, forestry land) allows responsible management of lands to sustain local economies.
